At some point during the job the vent from the clothes dryer broke. Without even asking one of the guys purchased a new vent and installed it. I offered to pay for that part and was told no. It would have been easy to slap some duct tape on the old one without letting me know.

Paul the foreman on the job. His diligence prior to the start of the project is why things went so well. He spent literally hours going over the property to have a game plan when things started. Brian the electrical lead was patient and put up with all my questions. I know just enough about electricity to be dangerous and wanted to understand where everything went and what it did. I was never talked down to which I appreciated.

I was pleased at how well the two specialties worked together (rack crew and electrical). It was a pleasure to see a large crew descend on the house and do the installation so quickly. It was apparent to me that the electrical connections between three roof areas was much more complicated than I first thought and I suspect that a less experienced crew might have thrown up their hands at the job.
